Upon his return from the Church Rally, Nuschke had a meeting with Grotewohl, in which he discussed the methods used by functionaries of the National Front to reach those people who had not taken part in the recent plebiscite in the GDR. He told Grotewohl that in Karlshorst and in Koepenick, in Saxony and in other parts of the GDR, functionaries of the National Front had made use of loud-speaker cars in order to make public the names of non-voters, particularly shop-keepers. The population had been called upon to boycott these shops. Nuschke said that in his opinion the mission of the National Front was to win over opponents of the régime rather than to boycott them and vilify them. The same method was to be used to those who during the Church Rally in Leipzig had criticized the East German government. Grotewohl answered Nuschke that he shared his opinion; he had, however, to take into consideration the views of other members of the government as well.
